and
Literatura Chilena en el Exilio

Toda nuestra pictórica colectiva está agrupada por tendencias, escuelas o generaciones. En este caso presente, 'Pintores Chilenos en el Exilio', que se exhibe en el Exploratorium Gallery, de California State University at Los Angeles, se rompe esta norma.

Antes que nada debemos señalar que, ésta forma parte de las Jornadas Culturales Chilenas que se están efectuando con motivo de la celebración del tercer aniversario de la revista Literatura Chilena en el Exilio, junto a otras manifestaciones artísticas como son la literatura, el teatro, la música, y el folklore.

En efecto, la primera clasificación para esta expresión cultural y artística, es que un grupo importante de pintores chilenos, ha realizado la totalidad de esta obra fuera de su país; luego, están incluidas diversas tendencias y expresiones plásticas; la clasificación generacional, no se considera. Su agrupamiento obedece no a lo tradicional como se acostumbra en estos casos, sino a una expresión de solidaridad con el pueblo chileno.

En otras palabras, esta muestra no es la expresión del arte por el arte, sino la manifestación de un grupo de sus intelectuales en repudio a la dictadura militar imperante en la República de Chile. Nos hacemos un deber de destacar, aunque sea innecesariamente, la participación de Matta, considerado uno de los grandes pintores contemporáneos en el mundo entero.

Los antecedentes de esta muestra colectiva retroceden a su exhibición anterior en el Museo de Arte Contemporáneo, como parte de las Jornadas Culturales Salvador Allende, realizadas en la Ciudad de México; y a las efectuadas en las ciudades de Boston y Washington D.C., organizadas y presentadas por el Chile Committee for Human Rights que preside Isabel M. Letelier. Debemos agregar que éstas últimas fueron elogiadas por los críticos especializados, destacándose lo publicado en el Washington Post. Es necesario mencionar también que entre las personas que auspiciaron esta exposición se encontraban los senadores George McGovern y Edward Kennedy, los diputados John Burton, Ron Dellums, Don Edwards y personalidades como Felicia y Leonard Bernstein, Ramsey Clark, Lillian Hellman y John Fitzpatrick. Terminamos este breve preámbulo agradeciendo la generosa y efectiva colaboración del pintor René Castro.

Introduction

All painting begins with the aim of conjuring up or evoking the look of something which would otherwise not be there. Of all the arts, its function is the closest to that of memory. Music uses time to make itself complete, as time itself never can be. Literature argues, narrates or confesses. Poetry constructs a still centre within the flow of time. But painting is always about the presence of what is absent. And this is as true of a Piero della Francesca as it is of a Rothko.

To say this might be to suggest that painting was always awaiting photography so that it might then hand over its function to an art and a process which preserves appearances in a far more immediate and direct way. But this is not so. Because for painting, unlike photography, it is not the appearance at a given moment of the object being portrayed which counts, but the experience of looking at that object and considering it over a relatively long stretch of time. It is in this sense that all painting expresses familiarity.

The artists who have made this exhibition are political exiles. Exile is always a personal tragedy, yet one so beyond the experience of most people that it may be hard to grasp. Exile is like a multiple death, the death of countless familiar details which no others can ever replace. But in the twentieth century exile is often part of a national tragedy. Exile is the condition of freedom under dictatorship and oppression. Under these conditions, exile is embattled; and exile – unlike permanent emigration – is always foreseeing its end, in most cases not passively but actively. To live and work in exile is to live and work on memory, it is to concentrate memory with determination. That is true both politically and imaginatively.

It is now only necessary to put these two truths, these two aims together, the aim of painting and the aim of political exile, and one should be ready to enter this exhibition, opening oneself to the testimony of the imagination and courage of the artists who have made it...

ROBERTO MATTA

Born: 1912, Chile.

Studied: School of Architecture, Catholic University, Chile.

Trained as an architect. Worked with Le Corbusier on planning the 'Radiant City.' Joined the Surrealists in Paris. Matta explored boundless space, created an autonomous universe out of his preoccupation with physics. It was said that the best analogy to Matta's efforts could be seen in Hieronymus Bosch's fantastic creatures of Hell.

With the election of Salvador Allende as president of Chile, Matta devoted much of his artistic output to the Chilean experiment. Today, helping his fellow-countrymen in exile is central to his life.

'In the field of the imagination, pugnacity must be sustained as on a battlefield. Those who construct a new world either in a social context or in the context of culture, the intellect and the arts, are defined inevitably by their generous spirit, by their commitment in their work—but by their daring also, by their capacity to take up, with sufficient courage, the risks implied by any creative act, which is an act of renewal, and a true revolution.'

Matta (for the Comité France-Amérique latine)

First arrest after military coup, May 1974. Conditionally released in October. Rearrested March 1975. Released in July after international protest. He is now living near Paris.

...This cruel experience was rendered in drawings, paintings, engravings, sculpture and poetry, which I decided to exhibit in different galleries... In these exhibitions I would speak of man alienated, destroyed, annihilated, humiliated, blindfolded, forced to see a distorted reality; separated from nature and his fellow man.
